Sodium-dependent amino acid transport, mediated by the sodium-independent neutral and cationic amino acid transport systems, is an important facet of cancer cell physiology. The neutral amino acid transport system is strongly activated by extracellular acidification. Expression of several neutral amino acid transport proteins has been detected by immunohistochemical staining in tumour cells of several types of human malignancies, and in some cases has been linked to cell malignancy, or response to chemotherapy. Amino acid transport is also a critical component of the metabolism of drugs which include antitumour platinum complexes, 2-deoxycytosine, monomethylhydrazine, and 1,3-bis(2-chloroethyl)-1-nitrosourea. The antitumour activity of many of these drugs is reduced by inhibition of the amino acid transport system. In addition, transport inhibitors can function independently as antitumour agents in some models. Many of the antitumour effects of the transport inhibitors have been shown to be mediated by transport-dependent effects on cell proliferation, growth, and differentiation. These effects occur through a mechanism which appears to be distinct from those of other anticancer agents. This article will review the current status of the biochemical, molecular, and biological aspects of aminophosphonate transport inhibitors and, in particular, their potential uses as anticancer agents.
