Windows 98/ME/2000/XP.In part 1 of the series, we looked at the academic and practical impacts of the More Game Less Money campaign on schools in England, and the latest school-led initiatives that have sprung up as a result of More Game Less Money. Today we're looking at a new campaign inspired by More Game Less Money. We hope that this will make learning more engaging for young people and more enjoyable for teachers. This is more than an education initiative. This is a media-based creative campaign. As such, it will be interesting to see how well it resonates with young people, and in what ways it will have an impact on people's lives. A lot of the creative and media components have already been made. As such, we're keen to see how this might develop and evolve. The implementation of More Game Less Money has opened up some exciting new opportunities for schools. While it has been impressive to see how the campaign has inspired so many creative responses from schools around the country, it has also been great to see the schools leading the way in developing the first ever creative curriculum for young people. It is possible to use the ideas from the campaign to help develop any subject area, and not just English. That said, we have heard that English teachers are particularly keen to get involved. One of the first ideas that was born out of the More Game Less Money campaign was the Game-Based Learning (GBL) tag. Game-Based Learning – or GBL – is essentially a creative approach to learning. It is used in a range of subject areas from basic literacy to computing to science, and to history, the arts and even politics. GBL is about creating and playing games that tie in with a subject, and using games to develop skills and understanding. So what exactly is the idea behind the GBL tag? Well, it is about transforming the way we learn and engage young people. We want to create learning spaces and environments that allow for collaborative and creative learning – where people can work together and explore the world around them. GBL is about allowing people to experience the world through making connections and using context to communicate ideas. As such, we wanted to develop a campaign that would really help 82157476af
